

Group Therapy

written by Richard Leslie | May 24, 2016

With respect to the psychotherapist-patient privilege or similarly named privileges, the general rule is that the patient is the “holder” of the privilege. Since group therapy involves more than one patient, a question arises as to whether or not the communications and information about one of the group participants will be privileged if later subpoenaed in a lawsuit involving that particular group participant.